

ing when they came to New York?"

"At the Hotel Walton."

"Where did they move after that?"

"To a cottage at Sheepshead Bay."

"Were you at the Sheepshead Bay cottage from May 20 to June 2?"

"Yes, sir."

"Was Young there overnight?"

"He was."

"Was Young present at the race track on June 2?"

"He was."

"Was he doing business?"

"No, sir."

"Now, I will show you an exhibit, and ask you if that is in Young's handwriting."

"Yes, sir. I saw him write it on June 2, and he gave it to me to mail."

"I offer it in evidence," said the prosecutor.

"I object," said Levy.

"It is only for the purpose of showing Young's state of mind at the time," said Rand.

Letters to Form Basis of Conspiracy Charge

The foundation for the conspiracy charge was laid by Mr. Rand when he called Richard Tompkins, colored, of Washington, to the stand. Tompkins is a clerk in the office of the Auditor for the War Department and said he worked there when Julia Patterson, now Mrs. Smith, was employed in the office.

Tompkins said he was familiar with the handwriting of Mrs. Smith and identified the "Julia" letter as having been written by her. This letter is one of the most important pieces of evidence offered by the prosecution. It was addressed to Young and said Nan was frantic and she (Julia) would not be responsible for the consequences unless Young visited Miss Patterson. The letter fell into the hands of Mrs. Young, and she wrote her name on it, then turned it over to her husband. It is this letter which forms the basis of the conspiracy charge.

A vigorous effort was made by the defense at the last trial to exclude the letter, but Justice Davis admitted it, although he was doubtful of its value as evidence. A similar fight against its admission will be made this time.

When Mrs. Smith was called to the stand the letter written by Nan to Ada Patterson was handed to her.

"It is in the handwriting of my sister," she replied, and she was permitted to go.

William Luce told substantially the story he had told at the last trial. He said that about 7 o'clock on the evening before the shooting, Young, and his wife had dined in his (Luce's) home. Young went out five or six times to get drinks. At 11 o'clock Luce accompanied the bookmaker to the corner where he met Miss Patterson. Luce left Young with her and went home. He met them again at 1 a. m. at 125th street and Eighth avenue. The three went to Flannery's barroom, at 125th street and St. Nicholas avenue, where drinks were served. Part of the time Young and Miss Patterson sat alone, but later they came over to Luce's table.

Young Jolly at Dinner

"How did Young act at dinner in your house?" asked Rand.

"He appeared to be very jolly."

"How did they talk in the saloon?"

"Sometimes loud and sometimes very low."

"Did you overhear anything?"

"Yes; I heard Young offer her a cigarette."

"Was the defendant crying?"

"She was part of the time."

"What was said between them after joining you at your table?"

"Young said he was going away the next day, and she said she would stop him."

"He said, 'Why, you don't even know the name of the ship I am going on,' and she said she did know. Young then took a $100 bill and handed it to me, saying she could have it if she named the boat. She said she could name it, but wouldn't give him the satisfaction of doing so."

"What else was said about his leaving?"

"One time when he said he was going she said: 'You needn't hide in the hold of the boat tomorrow, because I'm going to be there and I'll find you. No more will be big enough to hide you from me.'"

"After leaving the saloon the three walked to Eighth avenue, where they engaged the cabs. Luce doesn't recall the statement of the cabmen that Young was drunk."

Luce Was in Pawnshop

On cross-examination Mr. Levy brought out an interesting admission from Luce.

"You have been in Stern's pawnshop, have you not?" asked the lawyer.

"Three or four times," Luce replied.

"Before the shooting?"

"Before the shooting, and I was there after I read in the papers that the pistol had been bought in the pawnshop."

"And you were the last of Caesar Young's relatives to see him alive?"

"I was. I saw him at the house on the morning of the shooting."

"That's all," shouted Levy.

"How long before the shooting were you there?"

COMMISSIONER MACFARLAND ADDRESSES VETERANS

"Several years before," the witness replied.

"Did you give Young any pistol on the morning when he started to sail?"

"I did not."

Bernard McKeon, another brother-in-law of Young, told of going with Young to meet Miss Patterson, and said the three went to a restaurant. That was about a month before the shooting. McKeon said Young told the woman he wanted her to go away and she objected.

"I love you with all my heart and I love you better than your wife can love you," the witness said he heard Miss Patterson say, but after much persuasion she consented to go. It was agreed she should sail on the following Wednesday.

Excuse for Not Sailing.

"Did she sail?" asked Rand.

"No. I got the ticket, but when the time came she said she was in delicate health and could not go away."

"Young said she could have all the money she wanted, but she should write to me for it."

"Was anything said about the letter sent by Julia Smith?"

"Yes, Young told her if she hadn't sent it there would have been no trouble, and she would not have to go away."

"Well, I sent it to the Imperial Hotel thinking you would get it. I did not think Mrs. Young would get it," Miss Patterson replied.

It required much prompting on the part of Rand to cause the witness to remember all the conversation about the letter. It was important the prosecution establish that Miss Patterson knew the contents of the letter and was a party to the sending of the missive.

Rand showed the "Julia" letter to McKeon and asked him whether he recognized it. Young's handwriting in the corner. He said he did.

"After leaving the restaurant where did you go?"

"Miss Patterson accompanied Young to 125th street, where he left us to go to the races. I escorted her to a restaurant in 125th street, where we had luncheon, and then I went home."

McKeon's testimony was not finished when adjournment was announced.

WEST STILL CONSIDERING WALSH "CRAP" CASE

Commissioner West has made no recommendation as yet concerning the verdict of the police trial board in the "crap" case against Officer Walsh, of the Georgetown precinct. He is waiting for the stenographic notes of the recent hearing in which Attorney Lambert entered an appeal from the verdict of guilty, to be transcribed.

The commissioners have refused to reconsider the cases of Officers Hoffman and Laleger, both of whom were convicted of playing "crap" and dismissed from the force.
